Purpose & Objectives

The conference will provide practitioners with the most recent advances and information that will enhance knowledge, skills and performance in the treatment and diagnosis of selected infectious diseases.

At the end of this program, the participants should be able to:

• Discuss the emergence of antimicrobial resistance in gonococcal infections and the new recommended guidelines for treatment

• Describe the pathophysiology and clinical manifestations of syphilis and how rising rates of syphilis among pregnant women in the United States have increased the number of infants born with congenital syphilis

• Outline the epidemiology and rising prevalence of Multidrug Resistant Organisms (MDRO) and how prevention and control will reduce the burden of MDROs

• Explain the critical need and implications for development of new antimicrobial agents

• Discuss information regarding current public health issues and the culture of health in Nebraska

• Describe the various laboratory tests that are available for the diagnosis of HIV infections and how they should be used and interpreted

• Describe evidence-based practice guidelines in the prevention and treatment of catheter-associated urinary tract infections

• Interpret and employ the latest developments in vaccines and vaccination policies and procedures

• Review the symptoms and causes of hepatitis C and discuss new developments in its treatment and management
